

The Washington Post

washingtonpost.com > Nation

» FOLLOW THE POST ON:

Pentagon recommends Medal of Honor for a living soldier

By Greg Jaffe and Craig Whitlock
Washington Post Staff Writer
Thursday, July 1, 2010

The Pentagon has recommended that the White House consider awarding the Medal of Honor to a living soldier for the first time since the Vietnam War, according to U.S. officials.

The soldier, whose nomination must be reviewed by the White House, ran through a wall of enemy fire in Afghanistan's Korengal Valley in fall 2007 in an attempt to push back Taliban fighters who were close to overrunning his squad. U.S. military officials said his actions saved the lives of about half a dozen men.

It is possible that the White House could honor the soldier's heroism with a decoration other than the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest award for valor. Nominations for the Medal of Honor typically include detailed accounts from witnesses and can run hundreds, if not thousands, of pages. The review has been conducted so discreetly that the soldier's family does not know that it has reached the White House, according to U.S. officials who discussed the nomination on the condition of anonymity because a final decision is pending.

Pentagon officials requested that The Washington Post not name the soldier to avoid influencing the White House review. Administration officials declined to comment on the nomination.

\(Photos of the past six Medal of Honor recipients\)

The nomination comes after several years of complaints from lawmakers, military officers and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that the Pentagon had become so cautious that only troops whose bravery resulted in death were being considered for the Medal of Honor. Gates "finds it impossible to believe that there is no one who has performed a valorous act deserving of the Medal of Honor who has lived to tell about it," said Pentagon spokesman Geoff Morrell, who declined to comment on specific nominations.

George W. Bush similarly lamented during the latter days of his second term as president that he had never had an opportunity to present the award to a living recipient.

The presentation of a Medal of Honor to a living soldier would be an important moment for President Obama, whose relationship with the military has been complicated in recent

GALLERY

Medal of Honor recipients
A look at the past six recipients of the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest award for valor, from Iraq and Afghanistan.
» LAUNCH PHOTO GALLERY

Network News MY PROFILE

Friends' Activity

View More Activity

Network News PROFILE

View More Activity

Highest honor
No living recipient has been awarded the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest military decoration, since the Vietnam War.

	Total medals awarded, by war	Number posthumous
Iraq	4	4
Afghanistan	2	2
Gulf War	No medals awarded
Somalia	2	2
Vietnam	246	154
Korean War	133	95
World War II	464	266
World War I	124	33

SOURCE: U.S. Army Center of Military History
The Washington Post

TOOLBOX

Resize Print E-mail
 Reprints

WHO'S BLOGGING powered by sphere

» Links to this article

months by controversy over the administration's Afghan war deliberations in the fall and the recent firing of Gen. Stanley A. McChrystal for remarks that belittled senior Obama administration officials.

The honor would also mark an important moment for a military that is exhausted after nine years of repeated deployments and increasingly worried that the rest of the country has tuned out the wars and their service. "There has been a certain emotion that is almost like martyrdom within the military," said Richard Kohn, a military historian at the University of North Carolina. "It's a feeling that they are sacrificing a great deal while the rest of the country is going about its business."

Obama presented a posthumous Medal of Honor in September to the family of Sgt. 1st Class Jared Monti for his heroism in exposing himself to enemy fire to retrieve a wounded comrade. But honoring a living soldier with the nation's highest award for valor would give the president an opportunity to ease some of the military's feelings of estrangement from the rest of U.S. society.

Such a ceremony also would allow the president to honor military heroism and virtue, sentiments that Republicans say Obama does not celebrate frequently enough.

The award has the potential to produce something increasingly rare in today's wars: a recognizable hero in uniform. "The Afghan and Iraq wars really haven't produced heroes with a face," said Peter Feaver, a professor at Duke University who served in the Bush White House. In World War II, Medal of Honor winners such as Audie Murphy and John Basilone came to represent the ideals of the U.S. fighting force.

CONTINUED 1 2 Next >

Network News MY PROFILE

View More Activity

© 2010 The Washington Post Company

Ways you can get us

- Mobile
- Newsletter & alerts
- RSS
- Facebook
- Twitter

- Podcasts
- Widgets
- Post Store
- Photo Store

Website

- About Us
- Work for us
- Site map
- Topics Index
- Search terms
- Make us your homepage
- Corrections

Newspaper

- About The Post
- Subscribe
- Home delivery service
- Topics Index
- e-Replica
- PostPoints

Company

- Post Company web sites
- Advertise
- In the newspaper
- On the web site
- Feedback
- Contact the Ombudsman

Partners

