present certain psychiatric and lay evidence regarding his mental condition. This contention is belied by the record. Counsel presented a defense that Khaimchayev's mental state precluded him from acting with the requisite premeditation and deliberation necessary to support a conviction for first-degree murder. Counsel's decision was an exercise of sound trial strategy and did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness. See Williams v. Woodford, 384 F.3d 567, 610-611 (9th Cir. 2004). Accordingly, the state court's decision rejecting Khaimchayev's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel was not contrary to, and did not involve an unreasonable application of, clearly established federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States; nor was it an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented. See 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d); see also Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 687-88 (1984).
