 The Honorable Andrew P. Gordon, United States District Judge for the District of Nevada, sitting by designation.

Defendant Cuong Mach Binh Tieu appeals his convictions following guilty pleas to ten racketeering and drug trafficking charges. Tieu alleges that: (1) trial counsel was ineffective for failing to inform him that the government might offer a package plea deal in the future; (2) trial counsel had an actual conflict of interest because counsel could not move for specific performance of a lapsed plea offer without conceding his ineffectiveness; and (3) the district court abused its discretion by declining to appoint independent counsel to advise Tieu about the availability of a motion for specific performance of a lapsed plea offer. Tieu insists that the record is adequately developed to permit us to rule on his claims now. We have jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, and we affirm.

Tieu claims that when counsel advised him on whether to accept his original individual plea offer, counsel did not inform him that any future plea offer might be a package deal, less favorable because it would be contingent upon acceptance by his co-defendant, who later rejected the offer. To establish ineffective assistance of counsel, Tieu must show that: (1) counsel's performance was deficient, in that it fell below an objective standard of reasonableness; and (2) counsel's deficient performance prejudiced the defense. See Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 687 (1984). Failure to meet either prong is fatal to an ineffective assistance of counsel claim. See Gentry v. Sinclair, 705 F.3d 884, 899

(9th Cir. 2012). We conclude that Tieu has not met his burden under the first prong to show that a reasonable criminal defense attorney, knowing that package deals are not offered in every multi-defendant case, should have informed his client that the government might decide to offer a package plea deal in the future. See Cheney v. Washington, 614 F.3d 987, 995 (9th Cir. 2010) (“The defendant bears the burden of overcoming the strong presumption that counsel performed adequately.”). This theory is insufficient to establish that Tieu’s counsel was ineffective.

Next, Tieu contends that his counsel’s ineffectiveness resulted in an actual conflict of interest because moving for specific performance of Tieu’s initial lapsed plea agreement would force his counsel to concede ineffectiveness. However, showing a conflict is not enough; Tieu must demonstrate that “some plausible alternative defense strategy or tactic might have been pursued but was not[.]” Hovey v. Ayers, 458 F.3d 892, 908 (9th Cir. 2006) (citation omitted, emphasis added). Tieu’s proposed motion for specific performance was not plausible because it required a showing of counsel’s ineffectiveness, and we conclude counsel was not.

Finally, Tieu claims that the district court abused its discretion by declining to appoint independent counsel to advise Tieu about the availability of a motion to compel specific performance of the lapsed plea offer. We review the district court's denial of a motion for substitution of counsel for abuse of discretion. See United States v. Rivera-Corona, 618 F.3d 976, 978 (9th Cir. 2010). Here, the district court conducted an ex parte hearing in which he questioned defense counsel to evaluate the extent of any potential conflict and the likelihood that such a motion would be meritorious at this stage of the case. See United States v. Roston, 986 F.2d 1287, 1292 (9th Cir. 1993) (concluding that a single in camera session was an "extensive" inquiry). The district court concluded that a second opinion from independent counsel was not necessary since there was no showing of ineffectiveness at that point in the prosecution of Tieu. The district court's inquiry was adequate, and its decision to decline to appoint independent counsel was not an abuse of discretion.

AFFIRMED.
