SUMMARY

Immigration

The panel denied Javier Martinez-Hernandez's petition for review from the Board of Immigration Appeals' decision denying his motion to reopen on the basis of ineffective assistance of counsel.

The panel held that the BIA did not abuse its discretion by rejecting petitioner's argument that his counsel was ineffective for failure to seek cancellation of removal, because petitioner failed to make the necessary threshold showing that his claim for cancellation was plausible.

OPINION

PER CURIAM:

Petitioner Javier Martinez-Hernandez seeks review of a final order of the Board of Immigration Appeals denying a motion to reopen on the basis of ineffective assistance of counsel. We deny the petition for review.

Petitioner entered the United States at age one in 1984. In 1997, when he was still a minor, his permanent-resident mother applied on his behalf for an I-130 visa. The visa application did not progress, and in 2002, Petitioner was placed in removal proceedings. He successfully terminated those proceedings and continued pursuit of the visa. He received a visa in 2004 and was officially admitted to the United States. By that time, he was no longer a minor. He subsequently failed to apply for adjustment of status within one year as permitted by the Child Status Protection Act of 2002.¹

Meanwhile, in October 2001, Petitioner and an accomplice committed a violent offense against a police officer. Petitioner was 18 at the time. In December 2001, Petitioner pleaded guilty to the felony offense of battery with severe bodily injury, Cal. Penal Code § 243(d), with an enhancement for use of a deadly weapon or instrument on a police officer, id. § 1192.7(c)(11).

Petitioner's 2004 visa authorized him to remain in the United States for three years. He overstayed the visa, and in 2007, he entered removal proceedings. He conceded removability. Through counsel, Petitioner indicated he intended to seek cancellation of removal and adjustment of status. At an initial hearing, an immigration judge indicated Petitioner likely would be ineligible for cancellation of removal due to his criminal conviction. Petitioner's counsel ultimately applied only for adjustment of status. The IJ denied adjustment of status based upon Petitioner's failure to apply for such relief within one year of obtaining his visa.

On appeal to the BIA, Petitioner moved to remand his case to the IJ, arguing that counsel was ineffective for failing to seek cancellation of removal and for pursuing only adjustment of status. Specifically, Petitioner argued (1) adjustment of status clearly had been foreclosed due to the one-year bar; (2) counsel should have challenged the IJ's suggestion that the California felony conviction disqualified him from receiving cancellation of removal; and (3) counsel should have pursued cancellation of removal by asserting exceptional and extremely unusual hardship to Petitioner's permanent-resident mother and United States-citizen daughter. The BIA denied the motion to remand because Petitioner failed to satisfy the procedural requirements of In re Lozada, 19 I&N Dec. 637 (BIA 1988). Petitioner then moved to reopen the case, again alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The BIA held the motion to reopen satisfied the requirements of Lozada, but the BIA denied the ineffective-assistance claim on its merits.²

“We review a BIA ruling on a motion to reopen for an abuse of discretion, and will reverse the denial of a motion to reopen only if the Board acted arbitrarily, irrationally, or contrary to law.” Maravilla Maravilla v. Ashcroft, 381 F.3d 855, 857 (9th Cir. 2004) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). A claim of ineffective assistance of counsel requires a showing of inadequate performance and prejudice. Id. at 858. To establish a showing of prejudice in the context of a motion to reopen, it is not necessary for a petitioner to make out a prima facie case of eligibility for the ultimate relief sought—a petitioner “need not show that [he] ‘would win or lose on any claims.”” Id. (quoting Lin v. Ashcroft, 377 F.3d 1014, 1027 (9th Cir. 2004)). Rather, a petitioner must show “counsel’s performance was so inadequate that it ‘may have affected the outcome of the proceedings.’” Id. (quoting Iturribarria v. INS, 321 F.3d 889, 900 (9th Cir. 2003)). Such a showing cannot be made unless a petitioner demonstrates, at a minimum, that the asserted ground for relief is at least plausible. See Morales Apolinar v. Mukasey, 514 F.3d 893, 898 (9th Cir. 2008).³

² Petitioner filed two petitions with this court seeking review of these two separate BIA orders. We hold that the BIA's second ruling, which addressed the merits of Petitioner's ineffective-assistance arguments, mooted its earlier determination that Petitioner had not satisfied the requirements of Lozada. Accordingly, we deny as moot the petition for review in the first appeal, Ninth Circuit Case No. 11-70492.

Here, even assuming sufficiently inadequate performance by counsel below on any or all of the asserted grounds, Petitioner failed to make the necessary threshold showing that his claim for cancellation of removal was “plausible.” Id. Without such a threshold showing, a court cannot conclude that counsel’s inadequacies “‘may have affected the outcome of the proceedings.’” Maravilla Maravilla, 381 F.3d at 858 (emphasis added) (quoting Iturribarria, 321 F.3d at 900).

The BIA in this instance correctly noted that Petitioner presented no argument or evidence tending to show “exceptional and extremely unusual hardship” to a qualifying relative, a requirement for relief pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1229b(b)(1)(D). This hardship standard is stringent. It is not satisfied by the mere fact that the petitioner has a citizen child and a permanent-resident mother; more is required.

And, the appellate briefing to our court is devoid of argument, references to evidence, or even a narrative tending to suggest what the nature of the asserted “extremely unusual hardship” to Petitioner’s relatives might be. Cf. Partap v. Holder, 603 F.3d 1173, 1175 (9th Cir. 2010) (per curiam) (finding no abuse of discretion in the denial of a motion for remand where a petitioner “did not tender any evidence showing ‘exceptional and extremely unusual hardship’”). The BIA, therefore, did not abuse its discretion by rejecting the ineffective assistance of counsel argument and denying the motion to reopen.

The petition for review is DENIED.
